ACADEMIC PROFILE

I am a Digital Humanities researcher whose research centres on English language research and develops computational approaches applicable across multilingual and comparative settings. I specialise in computational corpus linguistics and methodological innovation, advancing computational methods to investigate language change, cultural expression and identity across historical and contemporary datasets in both English and non-European linguistic contexts. As a method-oriented researcher, I develop computational approaches and interactive research software that support the investigation of linguistic patterns, conceptual structure and cultural meaning. My current research spans computational historical linguistics, corpus stylistics, AI-assisted research software development and digital pedagogy.
